In order to further develop the transgenic mouse model of Wilson's disease (WD) in our laboratory, efforts have been made to manipulate the mouse genome to over-express copper-transporting ATPases. The Cu/Zn-SOD transgene contains the human Wilson's disease (HW) gene under control of the murine Cu/Zn-SOD promoter, and has been used to create a novel mouse model of Wilson's disease. Mutations in the copper transporting ATPase, ATP7B, result in a recessive, fatal form of copper toxicosis or Wilson's disease. We have created mice which are chimeric for human and murine ATP7B via the process of homologous recombination. These mice should be of use in understanding the regulation of ATP7B and, should they accumulate copper, will be useful in elucidating the molecular pathogenesis of the disease.

Giant melanoma: an unusual case treated with extracorporeal electrodesiccation. We describe a patient who developed a large melanoma on the left hip that exceeded the dimensions of the surrounding soft tissues (giant melanoma). The lesion was treated with extracorporeal electrodesiccation (ECD) followed by surgical excision of the melanoma. This treatment modality was developed for the purpose of treating large (circumferential) skin cancers by inducing apoptosis and bringing the treated zone into contact with the wound edges. Immediately following the ECD, it was observed that all necrotic and dermal portions of the lesion had been removed, leaving only a small portion of the lesion that was composed of healthy viable cells. In accordance with the technique of ECD and the location of the melanoma, the option of incorporating a surgical excision without any additional treatment was not considered necessary and could be counterproductive in this patient.
